Film Hits at Reds In Peace Movement

By PAUL HOPE
 Star Staff Writer

Two former Goldwater campaign workers and a former conservative congressman have gone into the film producing business to publicize what they call Communist infiltration of the "peace movement." They also expect to make money in the process.

The movie, "While Brave Men Die . . .," had its premiere last night in a second floor room of a Washington restaurant. Present were the producers, a few reporters and a dozen or so people identified with conservative organizations.

Fulton Lewis III, the man behind the projector when the House on Un-American Activities Committee's controversial film "Operation Abolition" was making the rounds a few years ago, is an officer of the company, co-director, co-narrator and a star of the new 30-minute movie.

Others in the company, called Newscope, are former Rep. Donald C. Bruce, R-Ind., who was defeated in 1964, and Roy Burlew, GOP finance chairman in Kentucky during the presidential campaign of Barry M. Goldwater.

Protests Are Shown

Newscope's first venture starts out with the roar of American jets flying over Viet Nam and a picture of a soldier hit by gunfire falling in a swamp. It ends with the American flag snapping in the breeze.

In between are about 30 minutes of film showing draft card burners, and American peace marcher waving the Communist Viet Cong flag, harangues by socialistic speakers, sit-ins and lie-ins at various places, including the White House, by peace demonstrators, a peace marcher urging that money be sent to the Viet Cong, a speaker pointing to an American flag and saying he didn't know the flag was going to be there or he wouldn't have agreed to make a speech—all interspersed with commentary by Lewis and Bruce.

Communists Mentioned

A brochure put out by Newscope says the film will answer the question of the extent to which Communists are involved in the peace movement. It doesn't quite do that, but Communists are mentioned frequently during the film.

The producers, who are charging $150 to any person or group wanting to buy a copy, were asked if the film was a money-making venture.

"We're a private corporation that should answer the question," Bruce said. They declined to say how much the film cost to produce.

Lewis is former research director for the House Un-American Activities Committee and was narrator and director of "Operation Abolition" a film which attempted to show that May 1960 riots in San Francisco were Communist inspired. He wrote speeches for William F. Miller, Goldwater's running mate in 1964, and for Dan Rosten
